

Acknowledgments

It is a pleasure to acknowledge my gratitude to all those who over the course of several years helped make this work possible. This book began as a doctoral dissertation at Brown University directed by Volker R. Berghahn. I am grateful for his encouragement, for our rich conversations, and for his example as a scholar and gentleman. I would like to thank Mary Gluck for encouraging me to explore the questions of cultural and intellectual history that made this study possible in the first place. I am grateful also to David Kertzer for lending his interdisciplinary perspective and for his careful reading of my work. At different stages of this work I was fortunate to receive the counsel and in various forms the criticism of David Blackbourn, Larry Eugene Jones, Jürgen Kocka, Jonathan Sperber, James Retallack, and Ronald J. Ross. I would like to thank specifically Margaret Lavinia Anderson for carefully reading a final draft of the manuscript and offering timely corrections and comments. I particularly thank Helmut Walser Smith for his thoughtful critique of my work, generous advice, and continuous encouragement at crucial stages. In addition, I would like to thank the anonymous readers at the University of Michigan Press for their helpful criticism of the manuscript. Many of these scholars have generously saved me from making mistakes, some have not agreed with everything I have said, and none bears responsibility for any faults. All have helped make this work more than it otherwise would have been.

In addition to the archived state documents, the research material for the subject of this book—anticlerical and anti-Catholic, liberal, Catholic, and Protestant books, pamphlets, newspapers, journals, and other documents from nineteenth-century Germany—at one time, judging by the card catalogs and microfiche inventories, amounted to a virtual mountain of material. In the course of the last century this mountain was whittled down as these materials were first under the National Socialist regime sometimes restricted or confiscated by the Gestapo for reasons known to themselves, later stored during the Second World War in mine shafts to avoid incineration in Allied bombing raids and then often lost, or finally in Berlin toward the very end of the war blown apart by approaching Red Army tanks and artillery. On many occasions my access to the material that survived was due to patient librarians and archivists willing to bear with my requests that they search again for materials miscataloged, misplaced, or marked Kriegsverlust and forgotten. Without their assistance and the efforts of others at libraries and archives in Germany this book would not have been possible.

I would, therefore, like to thank the archivists and librarians of the Archiv und Bibliothek des Diakonischen Werkes der EKD in Berlin, especially Dr. Leonhard Deppe for his hospitality, which extended beyond his responsibilities in the library; the Landesarchiv, Berlin; the Geheimes Staatsarchiv Preußischer Kulturbesitz, Berlin; the Landeshauptarchiv, Koblenz; the Hauptstaatsarchiv, Düsseldorf; the Stadtarchiv Düsseldorf; the Hauptstaatsarchiv, Aachen, particularly Dr. Herbert Lepper; the Staatsbibliothek Preußischer Kulturbesitz, Haus 1, Unter den Linden, and Haus 2, Potsdamer Str., Berlin; the Niedersächsische Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek, Göttingen; the Universitätsbibliothek, Freie Universität Berlin; the Öffentlichesbibliothek, Aachen; the Universitätsbibliothek, Düsseldorf; and Landes- und Stadtbibliothek, Düsseldorf. In addition, I would like to thank librarians at the New York Public Library, Central Research Library; and the John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Library, Brown University. Finally, I would like to thank the staff of Joyner Library at East Carolina University, particularly Patricia Guyette and Elizabeth Winstead of Interlibrary Services for their efficiency and Diana Williams and Michael Reece in the Office of Digital Projects for preparing the illustrations.

The research for this work was generously funded by several scholarly institutions and foundations. Support early on provided by the Volkswagen Stiftung through the German Historical Institute enabled me to receive paleographic training at the Karl August Bibliothek, Wolfenbüttel, and to tour archives in Germany. For grants that made the research possible, I am grateful to the German Academic Exchange Service (DAAD) and to the Berlin Program for Advanced German and European Studies of the Social Science Research Council and the Freie Universität Berlin. As a Fellow in the Berlin Program, I was fortunate to be part of an intellectually inspiring, interdisciplinary cohort of scholars. A Lawrence F. Brewster Scholarship from the Department of History, East Carolina University, freed time from teaching responsibilities and provided funding for travel, research, and writing. A College Research Award from East Carolina University also enabled me to return to Germany for additional research. I would like to gratefully acknowledge this support from East Carolina University as I encourage the university in its responsibility to support and fund future researchers and authors.

I thank also Geoff Eley, who as editor of the University of Michigan Press series Social History, Popular Culture, and Politics in Germany offered his interest, critical comments, and encouragement. I was fortunate to have at the Press the assistance of Christopher Collins, Sarah Mann, and the editorial staff. I should add that, unless otherwise indicated, all translations are my own. My colleagues in the Department of History at East Carolina University provided a collegial home, and I particularly thank Michael Palmer for his counsel, for ongoing encouragement, and for arranging time free from other responsibilities for completing the final revisions.

I give further thanks to Alexandra Staub and Demitri Bezinover for their hospitality during a memorable summer in Berlin, and I thank Elizabeth Bachhuber and Christoph Rihs for providing a warm refuge in Düsseldorf during a particularly dark winter. They gave me a home and family when I most needed them, and I continue to benefit from their stimulating insights about Germany, past and present. For offering along the way encouragement, sympathy, good humor, and other forms of sustenance I thank Michael Bassman; Susan, Melissa, David, and Patricia Bunnell; Eric and Janet Gross; Manik Hinchey; Birgit Jensen; David Scialdone; and my friends at the Berlin Stammtisch. I cherish their friendship. I would also like to thank my professional colleagues and friends with whom I communicate via email and telephone until we finally see each other again, usually at the annual conferences of the German Studies Association. Their camaraderie and our discussions together have kept me going in more ways than they might recognize.

I give special thanks to Carol Hager, who lifted me up, dusted me off, and set me on my feet when I needed it. Kerry McNamara has been there since the early years and was a constant friend during the research and writing. During the final phase of revision, Thomas Midyette, Charles Dupree, and Bets and David Crean kept pointing to the most important things. The memories of John Gross and Bodo Nischan lent perspective, and the impending arrival of Jessica Gross provided the final impetus to complete the manuscript. I especially thank my parents, Frank Robert and Jean Pichotta Gross, for their support during every stage of this book but even more for offering me their living examples of integrity and dedication. I thank above all my very best friend, Anne Bunnell. She patiently lived with this project from the very beginning and during stages of writing and revision let me get away with less of the cooking and housework. More important, she brought to this work balance and faith and to my life innumerable blessings. This book is for her.
