

Acknowledgments

I owe many debts of gratitude to people and institutions who have contributed support to this project. My first and greatest are to my teacher Tom Habinek and my colleague and mentor John Nicols. This book would not exist without their encouragement and inspiration. Philippe Buc, Christina Kraus, John Nicols, and Malcolm Wilson read the entire manuscript at various stages of completion and offered invaluable advice. Marlene Flory and Sharon James read and made useful suggestions on individual chapters, as did my colleague Ben Pascal, whose ability to spot verbiage shortened the manuscript considerably. I have profited a great deal from discussing Livy, memory, and space with Sarolta Takács. William Loy of the University of Oregon Geography Department offered generous encouragement and advice to the amateur cartographer. Jim Marks eased the burden of checking references and compiling the bibliography, and Ann Applegarth gave valuable assistance at various stages of the manuscript's production. The anonymous readers for the University of Michigan Press have vastly improved this book, with their criticisms and suggestions. I am grateful to all of these people for their help. The faults and errors of the final product remain my own.

A University of Oregon summer stipend supported three months of uninterrupted research in 1993. A Harvard Mellon Faculty Fellowship in the Humanities for the 1993–94 academic year made possible a year of research pleasantly interrupted by interdisciplinary discussion with fellow Mellons Paige Baty, Chris Bongie, Jennifer Fleischner, Dagmar Herzog, and Edward Wheatley. The Harvard Classics Department extended gracious hospitality, and I am especially grateful to Ernst Badian and Cynthia Damon, who included me in their Livy seminar.

Finally, I would like to thank my editor, Ellen Bauerle, for her constant encouragement and support.
