

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Some time has passed since I wrote the acknowledgments for this project when it was a doctoral dissertation, but I need to begin this book by repeating those thanks because they will never be enough.

Many thanks go to those colleagues who provided suggestions, and—most importantly—friendship and encouragement, down the long road of graduate school. I would most like to thank John Rattliff, Danielle Vinson, Karen Kedrowski, Zoe Oxley, and Mark Berger. Troy Dostert and Jim Battista deserve thanks for serving as trustworthy research assistants as well as valuable colleagues in graduate school. And I would also like to thank all my friends at the Duke Catholic Student Center who encouraged me in my pursuit of this long sought-after goal while never letting me lose sight of what I ultimately strive for.

Many members of Congress and their staffs, all of whom will go unnamed to protect the anonymity of their contributions, aided me in this research. I am deeply indebted to these people for their opinions and insights. Two people on Capitol Hill whom I can publicly thank are Jack Dail and Karen Buehler at the House Franking Commission.

My dissertation committee deserves many thanks for their aid both during the dissertation phase and afterward. Bill Bianco was especially influential in the development of some of the important insights in this book. John Aldrich inspired and guided me from my first class at Duke through the completion of this book. David Paletz supplied me with many insights and my first professional opportunities. John Brehm helped me through many methodological questions. In addition I would like to thank David Price for the advice and insights he provided before being called to serve in Congress. I would also like to thank R. Michael Alvarez and Paul Gronke for providing important data and ideas that helped shape chapter 5.

A National Science Foundation Dissertation Improvement Grant (SBER-9520169) aided me in my research for this project.

Acknowledgments

There are many more people I would like to thank for their assistance in the development of this book. Richard Fenno provided numerous valuable insights throughout the entire development of the project. David Brady, John Hibbing, and Glen Parker gave helpful advice as I worked on the revisions. I would also like to thank Paul Herrnson and the Center for American Politics and Citizenship at the University of Maryland for support during a summer of book revisions.

I would like to thank my wife, Judy, for all the support and encouragement as I completed the revisions for this book. Judy was not with me when this project started, and it is possible that I would have completed this book without her; but without Judy I know that my life would not be filled with the joy we now share.

This book is dedicated to my parents, William and RoseMarie Lipinski, who have given me countless opportunities to learn and grow. Growing up in a middle-class bungalow in ethnic Chicago, they promised me that they would support me through all of my schooling (although I don't think they imagined how many years it could be). This book is a token of my appreciation for all the love and support that they have given me that I will never be able to repay.

Without the help of all of these people, completion of this book would not have been possible. They contributed much to this book, but I remain responsible for any errors or shortcomings.
