

The Challenge of Regulating Managed Care

Michigan Forum on Health Policy

Series Editor: Marilyn M. Rosenthal

The Challenge of Regulating Managed Care, by John E. Billi and Gail B. Agrawal, Editors

A Note from the Series Editor

This book, and the multimedia health policy series of which it is a part, is predicated on a central belief: That social policy is best understood through the juxtaposition of positions, perspectives, ideas, and ideologies. These include the political, organizational, institutional, social science, and historical. This naturally produces a clash of perspectives among the social scientist, the bureaucrat, the policy maker, the politician, the practitioner, and the consumer.

Our central purpose is to lay out those different views, articulated by the best people we can find. Of course the editors have their own biases and preferences. We have tried to put them aside and help our audience and readers clarify and understand varying viewpoints. We are dedicated to raising standards for information and for judging “facts,” sometimes pointing out how difficult it is to establish “facts.” Often, positions and ideologies are based on assumptions, and sometimes issues are so complex that is the best we can do.

Presented first as a symposium at the University of Michigan, this book reflects that commitment to juxtaposition. How else can we understand the dynamic and confounding context within which we discuss and build social policy in American democracy?

Join us in exploring the complexities of formulating, legislating, implementing, and evaluating health policy across a variety of current and pressing national concerns.

University of Michigan FORUMS will appear in book, article, web site, and journal supplement forms.
