Conceiving Cultures
Conceiving Cultures

REPRODUCING PEOPLE & PLACES

on Nuakata, Papua New Guinea

SHELLEY MALLET

THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN PRESS
Ann Arbor
This book is dedicated to Wycliffe (Guli) Siyae na Nuakata tomowa maudoidi

and in memory of Antiya Meyau
Contents

Acknowledgments  ix

Introduction:
Imagining the Field
1

CHAPTER 1
Tracing Nuakata
39

CHAPTER 2
Colonial Impregnations
65

CHAPTER 3
Bearing the Inconceivable
103

CHAPTER 4
Belongings
141

CHAPTER 5
Planting the Past, Tending the Future
177

CHAPTER 6
Living Death
211

Conclusion:
Remembering Nuakata
259

Notes  275

Glossary  293

References  301

Index  323
Acknowledgments

Many people have labored with me to produce this book. Without their work some of the stories and experiences of people living on Nuakata could not now be heard by those who live far beyond Nuakata’s shores. First and foremost I thank the people of Nuakata for their act of grace in allowing my partner, Roger Averill, and me to live and research among them in 1993. We felt truly humbled by the hospitality and support shown to us during our stay. People’s friendship and unfailing humor enriched us, making this the most wonderful and memorable year in our lives to date. We long to return.

I particularly thank Wycliffe Siyae to whom this work is dedicated. It is he who taught me about ethnography. My failings in this regard, are, however, entirely my own responsibility. Wycliffe not only worked with me on my research, he also lived with us for much of our time on Nuakata. His family offered us a place to stay, and the people of Yalasi and Bolime generously built us a house, which over time became our home. Moses Diawasi, the community health worker, generously shared his time and expertise with me. His advice was sound and welcome. For all their kindnesses and assistance with the research I especially thank Eunice Tau’owa, Malida Tau’owa, Noah Siyae, Hosea Tau’owa, Yamesi, Roger, and Sinetana, the Siyae children, Geteli, Jane, Washington (Dracula), Douglishi, Roger, Noweli, Misake, Eba, and their spouses (Justin, John, and Penina) and children. I also thank Carpenter, Malida, I’unia, Davidi, Mona, George, Sara, Emma, Getuludi, Mari, Susan, Rose-mari, Thomas, Eric, Mesila, and the people of Hapela’awa’awa hamlet, including Jennifer Henry and Anne who were so helpful and hospitable when we first arrived on Nuakata. Yagu velau alimiyai. Finally I must make special mention of two other people from Nuakata. Antiya Meyau (d. 1995) shared his experiences, knowledge, and beliefs thoughtfully and generously. His life is an inspiration to me. Eba Siyae, Wycliffe’s youngest sister, remains our link to Nuakata. For her friendship, love, and the memorable times together in Australia we are forever grateful.

When we stayed in Alotau on the mainland, Ken and Lisa Shultz, together with their sons, provided us with a home away from home.
Their friendship and care, together with the practical support offered by the Summer Institute of Linguistics staff, particularly Daphne Lithgow, were much appreciated. I am forever grateful to Brian and Lorraine Raisson who appeared as if from nowhere at a time of great need and delivered us safely back to Alotau. Elva and Ray Averill also provided practical and emotional support during our time on Nuakata and beyond. I thank them for the food parcels, letters, for typing my field notes, and much more.

This ethnography neither began nor ended on Nuakata. Martha McIntyre’s stories of her experiences on Tubetube first captured my imagination. Her unique ways of thinking provided inspiration, and her personal and intellectual support made the fieldwork and later the writing seem possible. For all this and her ongoing friendship, I thank her. Other people too have provided both intellectual and personal inspiration, none more than Werner and Mary Pelz. It has truly been a privilege to know them both, and it is a great sadness to me that Mary died before I completed this work. My life has been diminished by her death. The intellectual passions of Chris Eipper and Lorraine Mortimer have excited my imagination throughout my ten-year ethnographic journey. As Chris Eipper challenged me to think about anthropology’s projects, Lorraine Mortimer challenged me to reflect on feminism and epistemology. They did this in the context of long-standing friendships that have provided both wonderful conversations and ongoing support. Two friends, Ann Jeffries and Di Lancashire, provided me with the intellectual support and confidence to embark on fieldwork. When I returned to Australia they shared my struggle to write the ethnography in a style that some may label experimental. It is true to say that without their friendship I could not have finished this book. Once completed, Margaret Jolly provided incisive comment and criticisms of the text. So too did Klaus Neumann and Henrietta Moore. Where possible I have tried to accommodate their suggested revisions.

The Sociology and Anthropology Department at La Trobe University provided a fertile and supportive intellectual environment while I was researching and writing this book. They provided some fieldwork funding. An Australian Postgraduate Award Research Award also provided funding. The manuscript was completed while I was working in the Gender Relations Project in the Research School of Pacific and Asian Studies at the Australian National University. I would particularly like to thank Margaret Jolly for her personal and intellectual support, Andrea Whitaker for her computer advice and emotional support, and Annegret Schemberg for her editing prowess and work on the text. Ria van der Zandt of the Anthropology Department in the Research School of Pacific and Asian Studies at ANU provided wonderful conversations and practical support during the six-month period that my computer crashed on a daily basis. Her efforts went beyond the call of duty.

During the researching and writing of this ethnography I have also appreciated the love and care of both family and friends. From a very young age my parents, Frank and Hazel Mallett, taught me the importance of education and the value of ideas. More than this they taught me that people and relationships are more important than anything else. I thank them for all this and their ongoing love and support. While writing chapter 6, “Living Death,” my beloved aunt, Norma Mcdonald, died of a brain tumor. I dedicate that chapter to her.

Peter and Clare Averill provided all the computing equipment, advice, and backup support necessary for me to write this ethnography. I could not have written it without this help. I am also grateful to Leanne Averill-Hutton and Stephen Hutton, Ian and Linda Mallett, and Jon and Karen Mallett for their support, especially while we were living on Nuakata. For their encouragement and forbearance I thank Maria Trombin and Soraiya Christensen, Owen Wood and Cate Wotley, Beverley Van Praagh and Colin Knight, Graham Perry, Yvonne Kelly, and Peter Gaskell. I am forever grateful to Andrea Whittaker and Bruce Missingham for their friendship during some particularly stressful times. Thanks also to Doreen Rosenthal for her support.

Finally, I owe my deepest thanks to Roger Averill for daring to take risks with me and for his unflinching love and support. Not only did Roger enthusiastically embrace my suggestion to go to Nuakata, but he has also listened to, read, and edited every line I have written since. For all this, and his love and care for our daughters, Grace and Lily, I love him.