Acknowledgments

It is my pleasure to thank the many people from whose support I have benefited in the writing of this book. My greatest debt is to Stephen Hinds, adviser and friend, who offered insightful criticism and constant encouragement at every stage of the book's growth, from its origins as a dissertation on Propertius 4.9, a substantially revised version of which forms the core of chapters 3 and 4, through its development into the present study, which offers a reading of Propertius' fourth book as a whole. Stephen has consistently reminded me, through his example, that outstanding scholars can also be exceptionally fine people.

Special thanks are also due to Fritz Graf, for it was in his Seminar at the Universität Basel that my interest in Propertius' final elegiac collection was first sparked. I am extremely grateful as well to Michael Putnam, whose careful reading of the penultimate version improved the book in countless ways, both large and small. I also thank the anonymous readers for the University of Michigan Press, whose many helpful suggestions and detailed comments led to substantive improvements.

I am grateful to my teachers, colleagues, and students at the University of Michigan, Florida State University, and Brown University, who were generous with both their intellectual support and their friendship, especially Netta Berlin, Ludwig Koenen, David Potter, Jeff Tatum, David Levenson, and Joseph Pucci. I thank also my editors at the press, Ellen Bauerle and Collin Ganio, and my copyeditor, Jill Butler Wilson. An earlier version of chapter 4 appeared as "Redressing Elegy's Puella: Propertius IV and the Rhetoric of Fashion," Journal of Roman Studies 84 (1994): 41–63.

Finally, my deepest and most heartfelt thanks go to my husband, James Kennelly, who continued to read and discuss drafts to the very end, and whose loving presence sustained me in more ways than I can say; and to my family—Lisa, Greg, Dawn, Tony, Paul, Brian and, especially, my parents—without whose unfailing support and love this book would not have been possible.
