Acknowledgments

I must start by thanking Leonade D. Jones, who was there at the inception of this project. Let me also express my heartfelt appreciation to August Wilson himself, for giving of his time and his materials. I will never forget sitting with him for over three hours between the matinee and evening shows of King Hedley II at the Mark Taper Forum in Los Angeles on September 9, 2000. I am also very appreciative of all the support provided by his assistant, Dena Levitin.

This book has been quite a process in coming. Along the way I spent time at the Stanford Humanities Center, and I thank the Center and its staff, most particularly my good friend Susan Sebbard, for all of its resources and support. I also thank my small cohort of colleagues at the Center with whom I met often and discussed issues of race and representation, Vilashini Cooppan, Susan Gillman, Ariela Gross, and Richard Roberts. I thank the members of my graduate and undergraduate August Wilson Seminar at Stanford, in the spring of 1998, for their incredible energy and insight into his work. These students, particularly Margaret Booker and Venus Opal Reese, had a profound impact on my work.

Several friends and colleagues have also contributed to this project. My good friend Imani Abalos helped me with reference questions and commented on matters of style. Ebony E.A. Coletu provided key philosophical insights. When I called, Alice Rayner and Janelle Reinelt were always there with superb advice on negotiating critical problems. Jim Grammar, who grew up in Pittsburgh, talked with me and sent me materials on the Pittsburgh of August Wilson. Kathleen Graham shared articles from Minneapolis newspapers on August Wilson. Michal Kobialka wisely referred me to the work of critic Giorgio Agamben. Celine Parrenas-Shimizu provided me with readings on race and psychoanalytic theory. Sandra Richards helped me think through questions of the Yoruban influence present in Wilson's work. Jenny Spencer gave me an excellent critical reading of the manuscript as a whole that greatly aided my shaping of its final version.

My assistant for two years, Nicole Fleetwood, was an incredible asset in so many ways, from negotiating contracts for the production images in the book, to working on the Wilson bibliography. Seraphina Uludong very ably finished the work on the photographs. Lisa Thompson also did extremely valuable work on the bibliography, and then Shawn Kairschner carefully completed the final stages. Ron Davies was extraordinary in proofing and preparing the manuscript for the press.

I thank my family, my mother and father, Barbara Elam and Harry J. Elam, Sr., my brother Keith and sisters Patricia Elam and Jocelyn Peron, my aunts Harriet Elam-Thomas and Thelma O'Brien for all their love and support.

I thank my editor at the University of Michigan Press, LeAnn Fields, for her wise counsel and guidance along the way and for her commitment to publishing critical work in the fields of theater and drama that has enabled our discipline to grow.

Finally, and most importantly, I thank Michele Birnbaum, without whose efforts and loving support this book would not be what it is now. She read draft after draft, made excellent suggestions for revisions, deftly talked me through problems, and sent me critical articles and references to look up in the library. Her incisive readings informed and challenged me. She helped me tighten my argument and focus my writing. She inspired me, sustained me, and believed in me in such a way that I felt her presence as I wrote every page.
