

Acknowledgments

For more than thirty years we have been fortunate to have students share their academic and personal successes, challenges, and life stories with us. We have been first-hand observers of what helped them learn and grow, excel and graduate. We have also heard and seen which approaches to college have not worked so well. We hope all of our students have learned from their time with us, and we are heartened by the many students who remain in touch with us long after their college experiences. But, just as they have learned from us, we now want to thank all of our students for all that we have learned from them. In writing this book, we pass along their wisdom to future generations of community college students.

We are indebted to Kelly Sippell and Philip Pochoda of the University of Michigan Press for their support and encouragement of this project. While it builds on the success of David's earlier book, College Knowledge: 101 Tips, they understood that there were unique issues facing community college students and that this population of students would be best served by a book addressing their specific concerns.

We want to thank our colleagues at the Washington Center for Improving the Quality of Undergraduate Education. Co-Directors Emily Lardner and Gillies Malnarich and, formerly, Barbara Leigh Smith and Jean MacGregor, have not only been great resources but have served to help us build relationships with community college and four-year colleagues across the country. Rachel Singer and Janine Graziano-King of Kingsborough Community College; Joye Hardiman and Sonja Wiedenhaupt of the Evergreen State College; Audrey Wright and Janet Ray of Seattle Central Community College; Barbara Williamson of Spokane Falls Community College; Laurette Foster of Prairie View A&M University; and Maureen Pettitt, Gail Davern, Kathy Larson, Bobbi Ashe, and Lynne Fouquette of Skagit Valley College all offered initial encouragement and ideas for this book.

We are also indebted to colleagues who offered specific feedback as we wrote. Eric Anderson clarified the role of community college counselors and student services and, with Denny Reid, checked the accuracy of portions of the book. Trish Barnes and Ann Zukoski provided invaluable suggestions about what helps students succeed in online courses. Larry Sult and Linda Moore helped think through how best to present some of the ideas; Linda additionally provided invaluable assistance with structure and organization. Students Katie Kozowski and Dan Vlasuk provided detailed feedback from the perspective of community college students. Keeping in mind the very diverse ages and backgrounds of all the other students with whom they have taken classes, they read drafts of the tips, sometimes multiple versions, and offered thoughtful, critical assessments and suggestions for revisions.

In addition, we thank the readers who provided feedback to the University of Michigan Press from Northern Virginia Community College, Hillsborough Community College, Seminole Community College, Bellevue Community College, and Westchester Community College. We also want to thank other colleagues, including Marcos Cicerone of De Anza College; Phyllis Dawkins of the HBCU Faculty Development Network; Ed Dolan of Bellevue Community College and Harper College; Julia Fogarty of Delta College; Jim Harnish of North Seattle Community College; Maria Hesse of Chandler-Gilbert Community College; Gary Hodge of Collin Community College; Ricardo Leyva-Puebla of Tacoma Community College; Jerri Lindblad of Frederick Community College; Marybeth Mason of Chandler-Gilbert Community College; Bill Moore of the Washington State Board of Technical and Community Colleges; Jacque Mott of Harper College; Louise Pagotto of Kapi'olani Community College; Cheryl Roberts of Chemekata Community College; Leslie Roberts of Miami-Dade College; Edwina Stoll of De Anza College; Ana Torres-Bower of Cerritos College; and Phyllis Van Slyck of LaGuardia Community College.

Finally, we wish to thank our families. Lynn wishes to thank her husband, Terry, for his unwavering support and long evening conversations about the important work of community colleges. She is also thankful to her parents, who, despite not having gone to college, believed in education. Her mother, Laura, who had always wanted to be a teacher, coached the whole family, including, ultimately, Lynn's father, through undergraduate and, in some cases, graduate degrees. Her father, Al, whose college plans were interrupted by World War II, taught her that it's never too late to become a student when, in his late forties, still working and helping raise his family, he enrolled in his first college class.

David wishes to thank his loving family for this, his ninth book. His wife, Karyn, and adult daughters, Adina and Shana, have offered constant encouragement. Karyn has been patient beyond words during this past intensive year of book writing. His father, Gerald, was passionately devoted to higher education, despite his never having received a college degree, and his mother, Sara, now eighty-eight years old, has always represented the most vocal and heartfelt cheering section for every endeavor.
