

Acknowledgments

I OWE A GREAT DEBT to many people without whom this book would never have been completed. First, I thank my dissertation committee. To Hanes Walton Jr.—mentor, exemplar, and father figure—thank you for sharing with me your endless knowledge of black politics and political parties. Second, I thank Michael Traugott for providing me with guidance, mentorship, and a healthy dose of humor. I also thank Nicholas Valentino and Vincent Hutchings. Working for and collaborating with them proved to be one of the most rewarding learning experiences of my graduate school tenure at the University of Michigan.

I am also grateful to many other scholars who aided in my intellectual growth. First, I thank Janet Boles, my undergraduate adviser at Marquette University, who encouraged me to pursue a career in academia. Second, I thank Nancy Burns and Donald Kinder for allowing me to participate in the National Election Study Fellows workshop and for providing me with funding to complete my dissertation research, which eventually evolved into this book. Finally, I thank Arthur Lupia for taking me under his wing. I only wish he had joined the faculty at Michigan earlier in my graduate career.

This book benefited greatly from financial support from the Howard Marsh Endowment, the University of Michigan's Department of Political Science, the National Election Study, the Gerald R. Ford Fellowship, the University of Michigan's Horace G. Rackham Graduate School, the Frank C. Erwin Jr. Endowment, and the University of Texas at Austin's Office for the Vice President for Research. I also thank Dara Faris, Jim Kelly, Ernest McGowen, Curt Nichols, and Bryan Tillman for their research assistance. In addition, I thank Jim Reische at the University of Michigan Press for his patience with and enthusiasm for this project from beginning to end as well as the anonymous reviewers for providing me with constructive feedback for improving on the original version of this book. Parts of an earlier version of chapter 1 were published in Political Behavior; excerpts from “A Party of a Different Color? Race, Campaign Communication, and Party Politics,” Political Behavior 26 (3): 249–70, are reprinted in this book with kind permission of Springer Science and Business Media.

I am extremely grateful for the support and friendship of a number of colleagues. I particularly thank Ryan Hudson, Amaney Jamal, Harwood McClerking, Brian McKenzie, Joan Sitomer, and Marek Steedman (aka the Dissertation Group); Sean Ehrlich; Gena Brooks Flynn; Mike Hanmer; Corrine McConnaughy; Irfan Nooruddin; Ismail White; and Rochelle Woods for helping me push this project along. I am also indebted to Gary Freeman, Terri Givens, Ted Gordon, David Leal, Bob Luskin, and Daron Shaw at the University of Texas at Austin and Karen Kaufmann from the University of Maryland for helping smooth out that bumpy transition from graduate student to assistant professor. Finally, I also thank some of my friends outside of the academy—Halima Henderson, Bridget McCurtis, and Ann Milo—for their encouragement and support over the years.

I owe the greatest debt of gratitude to my mother, Marcia Philpot. For as long as I can remember, she reinforced the importance of achieving excellence in all that I pursued and of using my success to give back. Although times were not always good, my mother always made sure my needs were met. Her sacrifices paved the way for me to succeed. Thank you for standing behind me and giving me a push when it was needed.

Finally, I thank my partner in life, Eric Leon McDaniel, whose love brings me endless happiness.
