When I go over my notes, it is striking how many people helped me and how pivotal their respective contributions were. Without the assistance of many of these people it is unlikely there ever would have been a book at all.

First, and always first, my wife, Eva, who helped in every way imaginable. Renee Lock got me going on this project when so long ago she sent me a pack of provocative newspapers clippings on the topic. My friend Bruce Firestone strongly encouraged me to bring my personal experience throughout the book. John Harris, world renowned philosopher and bioethicist, and his Manchester colleagues took me through the rudiments of formal philosophy and got me started in my education. Annette Clark guided me in taking page upon page of ideas and turning them into a book and then just kept on helping me and helping me. Jonathan Eames got me to the center of Oregon's health care world. Linda Ganzini generously shared her extensive research on physician-assisted suicide and the Oregon health care profession. Dr. Greg Hamilton spent time educating me about the anti-euthanasia position. Jim Bond, Erwin Chemerinsky, Sandra Johnson, Michael H. Shapiro, and Kathryn L. Tucker pushed me to expand the intellectual scope of my work. My colleague Marilyn Berger and Michael Ames, editor at the Vanderbilt University Press, made me clearly see the book I was not writing and so led me to the one I was. David Skover, my workplace neighbor, educated me about how to craft a good proposal and unfailingly encouraged me throughout. Martha Nussbaum coached me in being aggressive in order to get my book moved through the contract process. Nanette Cardon took indexing to a level I never conceived. Endless word processing was done by Nancy Ammons, Phyllis Brazier, and Erin Espedal. And the law school's incredible librarians—Kelley Kunsch and Bob Maniteaux endlessly guided and assisted my research, while Susan Kezelle spent half her days obtaining interlibrary loans for me. Finally my amazing editor, Mary Erwin, and the rest of the University of Michigan Press gang—Raphael Allen (my first editor), Anna Szymanski, and Christina L. Milton—who made this book a reality.
