

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The problem with acknowledgments is that there is always someone left out who feels that they should have been included. To that someone I apologize. My thanks go to all of the men and women of state, federal, and local law enforcement who agreed to share their stories, observations, and hard-won knowledge with me. I am especially grateful to those who gave me key documents about their cases. This is invaluable grist for any writer's mill. Unfortunately, there were many more stories than I had room to tell in this book, so some people whose insights were valuable are not mentioned by name.

Angela Bell of the FBI's Office of Public Affairs was a blessing, a cheerful and knowledgeable guide whose response to my queries was never no but always "Let me see what I can do." Among the people I write about in this book, four merit special thanks: FBI agent Bob Clifford; former assistant U.S. attorney Bruce Riordan; Kevin Carwile, chief of the U.S. Department of Justice's Gang Squad; and Sgt. Richard Valdemar, retired from the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department. Each helped me or sent me off in an especially valuable direction at one or another critical juncture in my research. There are a few others whose names must remain unwritten for reasons of discretion or personal safety. I am also grateful to Roseanna Ander of the Joyce Foundation, who suggested that I submit the proposal for this book to the University of Michigan Press, and I thank Jim Reische, who read the proposal, encouraged me, and offered invaluable advice on ways to make it better.

It goes almost—but not quite—without saying that this book would not have been possible without the tolerance and encouragement of my wife and my family. They are getting back a dining room.
