This book began at Rutgers University. It sprang from the training in early American history that I received at the hands of Thomas P. Slaughter, whose work continues to serve as an inspiration. The idea of writing a history that explores the early American roots of the contemporary militia movement emerged from a conversation with Paul G. E. Clemens in the spring of 1996. During my time at Rutgers I was a member of a remarkable learning community led by extraordinarily gifted teachers, including Michael Adas, Kathleen M. Brown, Dorothy Sue Cobble, Philip Greven, Allen Howard, Jan Ellen Lewis, and Joan W. Scott. David M. Oshinsky and Wilson Carey McWilliams served on my dissertation committee and offered me the benefit of their considerable insight into the modern Far Right. William Pencak, Owen S. Ireland, and Simon P. Newman read an early draft of the chapter on Fries' Rebellion, and the members of the Rutgers Center for Historical Analysis Seminar read an early summary of the argument of the book. I thank them all for their cogent criticism. Finally, I am particularly grateful for the friendship, advice, and encouragement offered by my colleagues Gregory T. Knouf, Peter C. Messer, Sara S. Gronim, Lucia McMahon, and Serena R. Zabin.

The path to becoming a historian and a teacher began long before Rutgers. The debts that I owe to the faculty of the Putney School, and especially to Hester and John Caldwell, David Calicchio, Felix and Marisa Lederer, Jim Johnson, Jeffrey Campbell, and Bob Mills can never be properly repaid. At Brown University, Robert H. Stanley sat me down one afternoon and told me that I thought like a historian even when I wasn't supposed to. Kurt A. Raaflaub, Philip Benedict, Gordon S. Wood, and Edward Beiser challenged me and encouraged me at key moments. Theodore R.Sizer offered an example of brilliant and compassionate teaching, and Paula M. Evans did more than anyone else to encourage me to take up education as my life's work. Elaine Temkin, Peter Santos, and Jacqueline Sutter did their best to make me a better teacher. My colleagues in the Law and Society program, the Brown Masters in Teaching program, and especially Beverly Schwartzberg and Shelley Warren, kept me sane along the way.

Since leaving Rutgers I have received advice and feedback on this project from a number of generous scholars, including Michael Barkun, Steven M. Chermak, Saul Cornell, Robert J. Cottrol, Jan E. Dizzard, Carolyn Gallaher, Glen Jeansonne, Gloria L. Main, Stuart McConnell, James M. McPherson, William Pencak, Christopher Waldrep, and David C. Williams. At the University of Hartford, my colleagues Michael F. Robinson and Leslie Lindenauer read the entire manuscript and offered detailed criticism that has made this a better book. Dean David Goldenberg and department chairs J. Holden Camp, Anthony T. Rauche, and Warren Goldstein have been enormously supportive of the process of revising the dissertation. I could not have asked for a better set of colleagues than the faculty of Hillyer College, whose cheerful dedication continues to inspire me.

Portions of the chapter on Fries' Rebellion draw upon Robert H. Churchill, "Popular Nullification, Fries' Rebellion, and the Waning of Radical Republicanism, 1798–1801," Pennsylvania History 67 (Winter 2000): 105–40, and appear here with the journal's permission.

This book involved research at a large number of manuscript repositories. I owe thanks to the staffs of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, the Bucks County Historical Society, the Connecticut Historical Society, the Indiana Historical Society, the Indiana State Library, the Lilly

Library of Indiana University, the Lincoln National Life Foundation, the Illinois State Historical Society, the State Historical Society of Wisconsin, and the Walter P. Reuther Library of Wayne State University. I owe Steve Towne of the Indiana State Library Archives and Manuscripts Division a special debt for sharing his unparalleled knowledge of Indiana politics in the Civil War era. I wish to thank the Clerks of Greene County, Indiana, and Coles County, Illinois, for facilitating my research in local records.

I also received considerable assistance from the staffs of the National Archives in Washington, DC, and the regional branch archives in Philadelphia and Chicago. The Freedom of Information Act Request offices of the Michigan State Police and the Detroit Police Archives responded to my requests quickly and completely. Finally, I owe a debt to the staffs of the libraries of Rutgers University, Princeton University, Yale University, and the University of Hartford. The Interlibrary Loan Department of the Alexander Library at Rutgers and Christine Bird at the Mortensen Library at the University of Hartford have been particularly helpful in handling over a hundred ILL requests.

Doing primary research on the militia movement posed special challenges. Chip Berlet of Political Research Associates, Donald Cohen, director of the Detroit office of the Anti-Defamation League, and Mark Potok of the Southern Poverty Law Center opened their archives to me and gave me the benefit of their insights. They will probably disagree with the conclusions presented here. Any researcher on the Far Right owes a debt to Mark Pitcavage for the creation of his marvelous Web site, the Militia Watchdog. Mark also offered advice on relevant sources and secondary literature as I was just starting out on the project. He too will probably disagree with what I did with his advice. Rick Haynes of the Michigan Militia took an afternoon off of work so that I could cull through the Michigan Militia Multi-Information Archive stored in his home. He then refused payment for hundreds of photocopies. Michael Vanderboegh allowed me to carry away a crate of his personal papers so that I could survey them and copy what I needed. Finally, almost two dozen militia members have been willing to take the time to speak with me about the origins and aspirations of their movement and to share newsletters and other primary material. Without their cooperation and trust this study would not have been possible.

My work has been supported by generous grants of aid from the Department of History at Rutgers University, including four and a half years of graduate assistantship, a year of fellowship support, and a series of small but timely research grants. I have also received fellowship support from the Rutgers University Graduate School and the Rutgers Center for Historical Analysis. I received a Vincent Coffin Grant from the University of Hartford and two Gareau Faculty Development Grants from Hillyer College, which supported additional research for the book and gave me the time necessary to finish the manuscript.

The biggest debt of all I owe to my family. My late mother, Faith Churchill, provided me with a first-class education. Telling my mother that I had finished my Ph.D. was the proudest moment of my life. She and my sister Diana encouraged me at critical moments. Dave and Elaine Pardoe have been model in-laws and grandparents. They have taken up the slack to let me work on occasions too numerous to mention. John Hastie has been a staunch friend for many years. I think if he hadn't kept pestering me I might never have finished the book.

My father, Donald Churchill, died at the end of my second year of graduate school. I never discussed this book with him, but there is a great deal of him in these pages. He was a man who believed that great principles do not shift with the times, and these principles gave meaning to his life and his understanding of events around him. In knowing him, I learned to listen closely, even to those from whom others turn away. After my father's death, my uncle John Churchill, his son Derek, and my Churchill and Labovitz cousins adopted me as a wayward son, and this has done much to ease the burden of his passing.

My son Colin and my daughter Natalie have given up entirely too much of their childhood to this book. Yet they are still my most ardent cheerleaders, displaying a generosity of spirit that I find humbling. I must have done something very special in my life to deserve the two of them.

Rebecca Joanne Pardoe has been my best friend, an extraordinary partner, and my proofreader, editor, and sounding board for twenty-one years. She has held down the fort during long research trips and frantic months of revision. More than that, she has listened to me and helped me find my way through every challenge, professional and personal. This book is the fruit of our labor together. Let us now rest a while and enjoy each other's company.
